SHORT READS | OCTOBER 1, 2024

Slight uptick in Americans wanting U.S. to help diplomatically resolve Israel-Hamas war

Add Us On Google

BY LAURA SILVER AND BECKA A. ALPER

U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken (left) meets with Israel's Foreign Minister Israel Katz (second from the right) in Tel Aviv, Israel, on Jan. 9, 2024, during his weeklong trip aimed at calming tensions between Israel and Hamas. (Evelyn Hockstein/POOL/AFP via Getty Images)

In the year since Hamas attacked Israel on Oct. 7, 2023, and Israel responded by invading Gaza, there have been modest shifts in U.S. public opinion on the war. This data comes from a Pew Research Center survey conducted in September, as well as previous Center surveys on the conflict.

- Slightly more Americans now think Israel's military operation against Hamas is going too far than thought so in December 2023.
- More Americans now want the United States to play a role in diplomatically resolving the war than did so in February.

How we did this

Pew Research Center conducted this survey as part of our broader research about U.S. public views on the Israel-Hamas war. We interviewed 9,680 U.S. adults from Sept. 16 to 22, 2024.

Everyone who took part is a member of the Center's American Trends Panel (ATP), a group of people recruited through national, random sampling of residential addresses who have agreed to take surveys regularly. This kind of recruitment gives nearly all U.S. adults a chance of selection. Surveys were conducted either online or by telephone with a live interviewer. The survey is weighted to be representative of the U.S. adult population by gender, race, ethnicity, partisan affiliation, education and other factors. Read more about the ATP's methodology.

In this survey, Jews and Muslims are defined as U.S. adults who answer a question about their current religion by saying they are Jewish or Muslim, respectively. Unlike our 2020 report on Jewish Americans, this report does not separately analyze the views of "Jews of no religion" (i.e., people who identify as Jewish culturally, ethnically or by family background but not by religion).

RELATED

SHORT READS | NOV 25, 2024
Wide partisan divisions remain in Americans' views of the war in Ukraine

REPORT | JUL 29, 2024
War in Ukraine: Wide Partisan Differences on U.S. Responsibility and Support

SHORT READS | APR 2, 2024
Younger Americans stand out in their views of the Israel-Hamas war

SHORT READS | APR 2, 2024
How U.S. Muslims are experiencing the Israel-Hamas war

SHORT READS | APR 2, 2024
How U.S. Jews are experiencing the Israel-Hamas war

TOPICS

Political Issues

War & International Conflict

War & International Conflict

MOST POPULAR

1 Catholicism has lost people to religious switching in many countries, while Protestantism has gained in some

2 Teens, Social Media and Mental Health

3 Americans Have Become Less Confident in Trump's Decision-Making on Ukraine

4 Negative views of Israel, Netanyahu continue to rise among Americans – especially young people

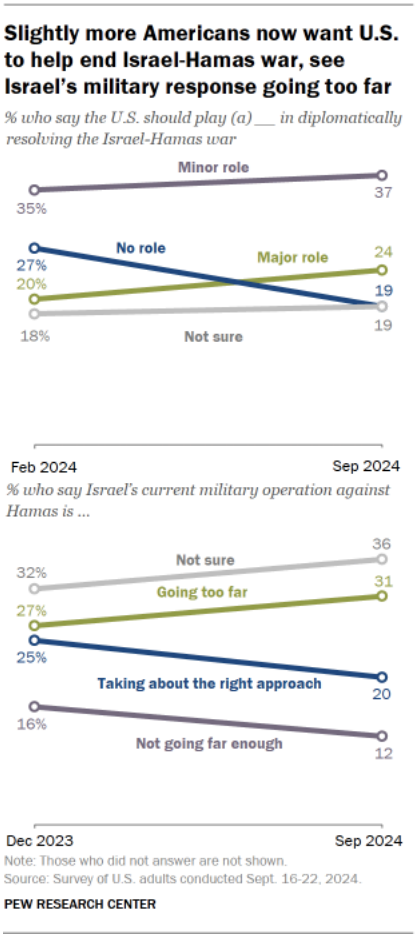

5 Americans' Social Media Use 2025

Although only some religious subgroups are analyzed in this report, the survey included respondents of many other religious backgrounds, including members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (widely known as Mormons), Hindus and Buddhists. But there are not enough respondents from these smaller groups to report on their answers separately.

Here are the questions used for this analysis, along with the topline and the survey methodology.

However, public opinion is largely unchanged on other questions about the conflict:

- Most Americans continue to think lasting peace between Israelis and Palestinians is unlikely.
- Confidence in Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to do the right thing regarding world affairs remains low.

Americans are also concerned about the war expanding to other countries in the region and U.S. military forces becoming more directly involved in the fighting. (Both as the survey was fielding and since, Israel and Hezbollah have been actively targeting one another across the Israel-Lebanon border. But the survey was completed before Israel assassinated Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, and prior to Israel launching a ground operation in Lebanon and Iran launching ballistic missiles at Israel.)

There are notable partisan differences on several of these questions, including on views about Israel's military operation against Hamas. Half of Democrats and independents who lean toward the Democratic Party think Israel has gone too far, while only 13% of Republicans and GOP leaners agree.

In the sections below, we explore differences on each question by political party and age. We also look at religious differences, including in the views of Jewish and Muslim Americans.

Views on diplomatic negotiations

A majority of Americans (61%) say the U.S. should play a role in diplomatically resolving the Israel-Hamas war. Still, more want the U.S. to play a minor role (37%) than a major one (24%). An additional 19% would prefer for the U.S. to play no diplomatic role at all, and 19% are unsure.

On balance, more Americans now want the U.S. to play some (either major or minor) role in resolving the war than in February (55%), when we last asked this question.

Views by party

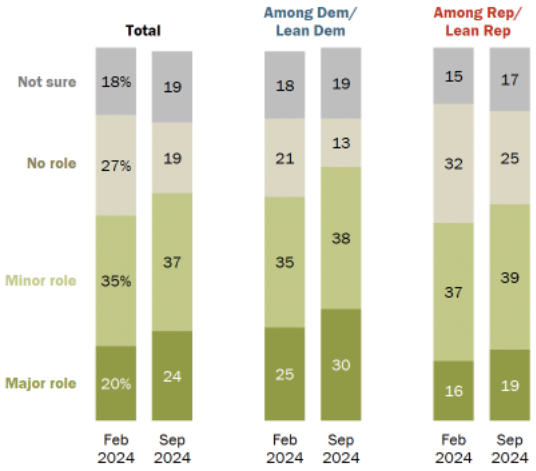

Republicans remain more likely than Democrats to say the U.S. should not play any role in resolving the conflict (25% vs. 13%), but shifts have taken place within both parties. The share of people who take that position has declined in both camps, falling by 7 percentage points on the Republican side and 8 points among Democrats.

On the other hand, 30% of Democrats now want the U.S. to play a major role, up from 25% in February. The share of Republicans who say this is up 3 points (from 16% to 19%).

Slight uptick in share of Americans who want the U.S. to play a major role in diplomatically ending the Israel-Hamas war

% who say the U.S. should play (a) ___ in diplomatically resolving the Israel-Hamas war

Note: Those who did not answer are not shown.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

Views by age

Views have also changed among the youngest adults. Today, 22% of adults under 30 want the U.S. to play a major diplomatic role in resolving the war, while 34% want it to play a minor role and 23% say it should play no role. The share saying the U.S. should have a major role has increased by 9 points since February, while the share saying it should have no role decreased by 6 points.

Looking at this age group by party, the share of Republicans under 30 who want America to play a major role in diplomatically resolving the war has increased 7 points (from 9% to 16%). Among Democrats under 30, it has risen 11 points (from 17% to 28%).

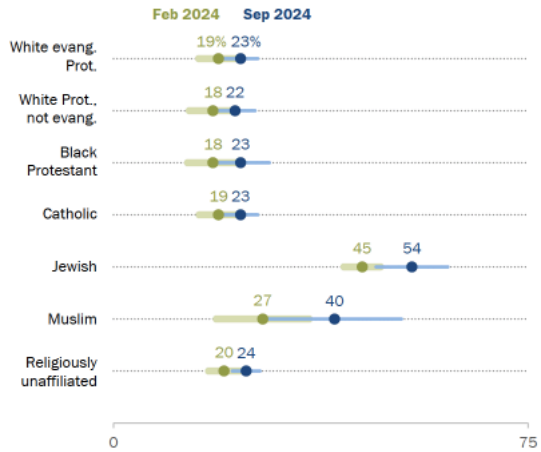

Views by religion

There are also differences by religion in views of the United States' role in the conflict. Jews were the most likely in February to want the U.S. to be heavily involved in ending the conflict, and the same is true now.

Today, 54% of Jews think the U.S. should play a major role in diplomatically resolving the war, up from 45% in February.

Jewish and Muslim Americans are more likely than others to want the U.S. to play a major role in diplomatically resolving the Israel-Hamas war

% who say the U.S. should play a major role in diplomatically resolving the Israel-Hamas war

Note: Lines surrounding data points represent the margin of error of each estimate.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

Among Muslims, 40% now say the U.S. should play a major role, compared with 27% in February. At that time, they were the second-most likely religious group analyzed to want major U.S. involvement.

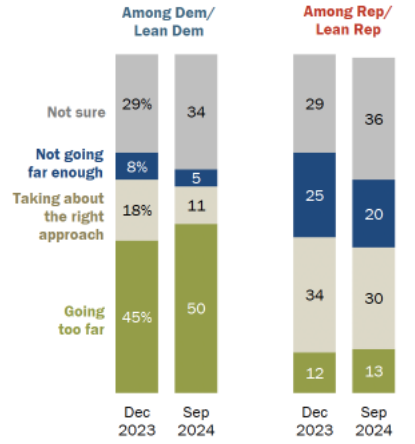

Opinion about Israel's current military operation against Hamas

About three-in-ten Americans (31%) say Israel's current military operation against Hamas is going too far, while 12% say it is not going far enough and 20% say it's taking the right approach. But a plurality of Americans (36%) say they are unsure about Israel's handling of the conflict.

Americans' opinions have shifted slightly since we last asked this question in December. Americans are now more likely to say Israel's military operation has gone too far or they are unsure. They are also less likely to say Israel has not gone far enough or is taking about the right approach.

Slightly fewer in both parties now say Israel is taking the right approach in its military operation against Hamas

% who say Israel's current military operation against Hamas is ...

Note: Those who did not answer are not shown.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.
PEW RESEARCH CENTER

Opinions have shifted among several subgroups. For example, the share of Americans ages 65 and older who say that Israel's military operation has gone too far is higher now (27%) than in December (16%). However, those ages 65 and older continue to be less inclined than those under 30 (41%) to take that position.

Partisan views have shifted as well:

- Democrats are more likely now than they were last year to say Israel is going too far in its military response (50% vs. 45%).
- Republicans are less likely now than in 2023 to say Israel's military response has not gone far enough (20% now, down from 25%).
- Republicans are also more likely to express uncertainty than they were in 2023 (36% vs. 29%).

Looking at changes by religious group, White nonevangelical Protestants are more likely than they were in 2023 to say Israel has gone too far (28% vs. 15%). Meanwhile, White evangelical Protestants are less likely to say Israel's military response is not going far enough (20% vs. 28%) and more likely to say they are unsure (35% vs. 23%).

The 2023 survey did not include enough Muslim or Jewish respondents to show their responses separately. But in the 2024 survey, 71% of U.S. Muslims say Israel's military operation is going too far, while 9% think Israel is taking the right approach and 3% say it has not gone far enough. The remaining 17% are unsure.

Jewish Americans, on the other hand, are quite divided on this question:

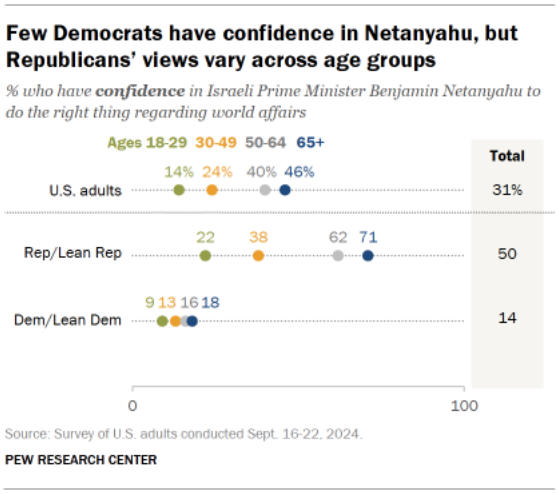

- 28% say Israel's military operation is going too far.
- 24% say it has not gone far enough.
- 32% say it is taking the right approach.
- 13% are unsure.

Confidence in Netanyahu

More Americans say they have little or no confidence in Netanyahu (52%) than say they have a lot or some confidence in him (31%) to do the right thing regarding world affairs. Another 17% have not heard of Netanyahu or did not answer the question.

There are large partisan differences in views of the Israeli leader: Half of Republicans express confidence in Netanyahu, compared with only 14% of Democrats. The 71% of Democrats who have little or no confidence in Netanyahu includes 39% who say they have no confidence in him at all.

Among Republicans, there are substantial age differences: 22% of Republicans under 30 express confidence in Netanyahu, compared with 38% of those ages 30 to 49, 62% of those ages 50 to 64, and 71% of those ages 65 and older. Age differences among Democrats are much more muted.

Of the major U.S. religious groups, White evangelicals (57%) have the most confidence in Netanyahu to handle world affairs. Within all other religious groups that can be analyzed separately, only a minority of respondents express confidence in the Israeli leader – including 42% of Jews. Muslims (9%) and religiously unaffiliated Americans (15%) are particularly unlikely to have confidence in him.

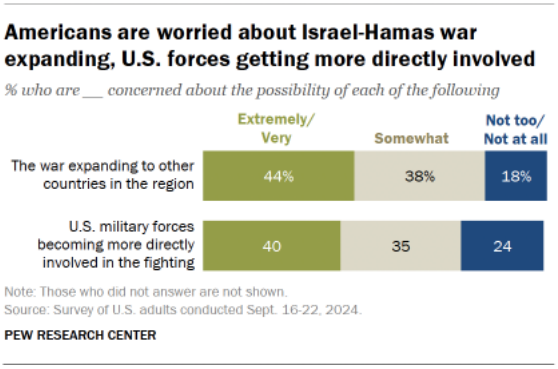

Views of Netanyahu are largely unchanged since April, but the share of Americans who had no confidence in him increased 11 points between March 2023 and April 2024.

Concerns about the war

Almost a year into the war, Americans are concerned about the potential for escalation:

- 44% say they are extremely or very concerned about the war expanding to other countries in the region.
- 40% are extremely or very concerned about U.S. military forces becoming more directly involved in the fighting.

The September survey was in the field during several developments in the conflict. Pagers and walkie-talkies belonging to Hezbollah were detonated in attacks widely attributed to the Israeli government. Israel also assassinated senior Hezbollah commanders, and rocket and artillery fire was exchanged across the Israel-Lebanon border. But the survey concluded prior to Israel's assassination of Hezbollah leader, Hassan Nasrallah, and before Israel began its recent ground operation in Lebanon and Iran's ballistic missile attack against Israel.

Still, at the time of the survey, concerns about the Israel-Hamas war expanding to other countries were largely unchanged since the question was previously asked in December 2023.(We have not previously asked the question about U.S. military involvement.)

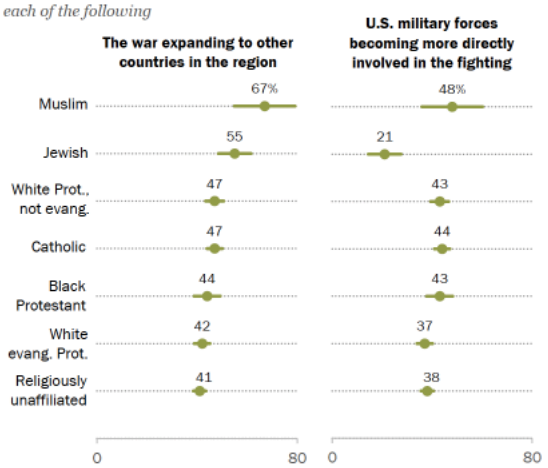

When it comes to the war expanding, there are slight differences by age and party, with older Americans and Democrats being modestly more concerned than younger Americans and Republicans, respectively. On the issue of U.S. involvement, people of all ages and in both parties are equally concerned.

There are also modest differences between religious groups:

- Concern about the war expanding to other countries in the region is especially high among Muslims (67%) and Jews (55%) in the U.S.
- Jewish Americans (21%) are less concerned than other groups about U.S. military forces becoming more directly involved in the fighting. For their part, 48% of Muslim Americans are concerned about this.

Muslim and Jewish Americans are particularly concerned about the Israel-Hamas war expanding; Jews less concerned about U.S. military involvement

% who say they are extremely/very concerned about the possibility of each of the following

Note: Lines surrounding data points represent the margin of error of each estimate.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

Perceptions of whether lasting peace is likely between Israelis and Palestinians

Relatively few Americans (4%) think it is extremely or very likely that there will eventually be lasting peace between Israelis and Palestinians. An additional 13% say lasting peace is somewhat likely. About two-thirds say it is either not too (37%) or not at all (29%) likely, and 16% are unsure.

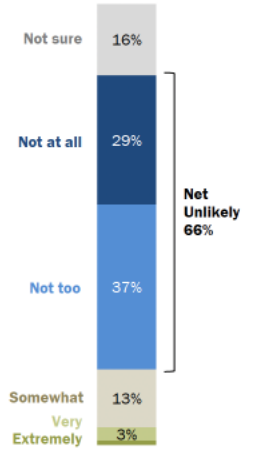

The public's views on this question are little changed since we previously asked it in February 2024. However, there have been shifts among some groups of Americans:

- 69% of Muslims now say lasting peace is unlikely, up from 53% in February.
- 7% of 18- to 29-year-olds say eventual peace is likely, up from 2% in February.

Note: Here are the questions used for this analysis, along with the topline and the survey methodology.

Few U.S. adults see lasting peace for Israelis and Palestinians as likely

% who think it is ___ likely that there will eventually be lasting peace between Israelis and Palestinians

Note: Those who did not answer are not shown.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

Topics Political Issues, War & International Conflict, War & International Conflict

SHARE THIS LINK: https://www.pewresearch.org/?p=188367

Laura Silver is an associate director focusing on global attitudes at Pew Research Center.

Becka A. Alper is a senior researcher focusing on religion at Pew Research Center.

Pew Research Center

901 E St. NW, Suite 300
Washington, DC 20004
USA
(+1) 202-419-4300 | Main
(+1) 202-857-8562 | Fax
(+1) 202-419-4372 | Media Inquiries

ABOUT PEW RESEARCH CENTER Pew Research Center is a nonpartisan, nonadvocacy fact tank that informs the public about the issues, attitudes and trends shaping the world. It does not take policy positions. The Center conducts public opinion polling, demographic research, computational social science research and other data-driven research. Pew Research Center is a subsidiary of The Pew Charitable Trusts, its primary funder.

© 2026 Pew Research Center

REPORT | OCTOBER 10, 2024

Americans' Views of 2024 Election News

Most Americans are following the election closely, though roughly half say it's hard to know what's true

Add Us On Google

BY ELISA SHEARER, MICHAEL LIPKA, SARAH NASEER, EMILY TOMASIK AND MARK JURKOWITZ

Table of Contents

People watch the ABC News presidential debate between Vice President Kamala Harris and former President Donald Trump at a watch party in West Hollywood, California, on Sept. 10, 2024. (Mario Tama/Getty Images)

How we did this

Pew Research Center conducted this study to better understand how U.S. adults get news and information about the 2024 presidential election.

The survey of 9,680 U.S. adults was conducted from Sept. 16 to 22, 2024. Everyone who completed the survey is a member of the Center's American Trends Panel (ATP), a group of people recruited through national, random sampling of residential addresses who have agreed to take surveys regularly. This kind of recruitment gives nearly all U.S. adults a chance of selection. Surveys were conducted either online or by telephone with a live interviewer. The survey is weighted to be representative of the U.S. adult population by gender, race, ethnicity, partisan affiliation, education and other factors. Read more about the ATP's methodology.

Here are the questions used for this report, the topline and the survey methodology.

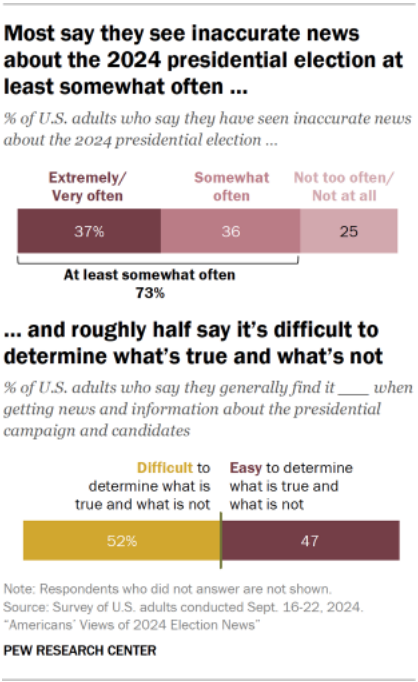

Pew Research Center is a subsidiary of The Pew Charitable Trusts, its primary funder. This is the latest report in Pew Research Center's ongoing investigation of the state of news, information and journalism in the digital age, a research program funded by The Pew Charitable Trusts, with generous support from the John S. and James L. Knight Foundation.

As Americans navigate the abundance of information about the 2024 U.S. presidential election, many of them are seeing news they think is inaccurate – and having a hard time distinguishing fact from fiction.

A new Pew Research Center survey finds that about three-quarters of U.S. adults (73%) say they have seen inaccurate news coverage about the election at least somewhat often, including 37% who have seen this kind of information extremely or very often.

About half of Americans (52%) say they generally find it difficult to determine what is true and what is not when getting news about the election. And 28% separately say that it's been difficult for them to find reliable information about the presidential election.

Supporters of the two major political parties are having vastly different experiences with election news in these ways.

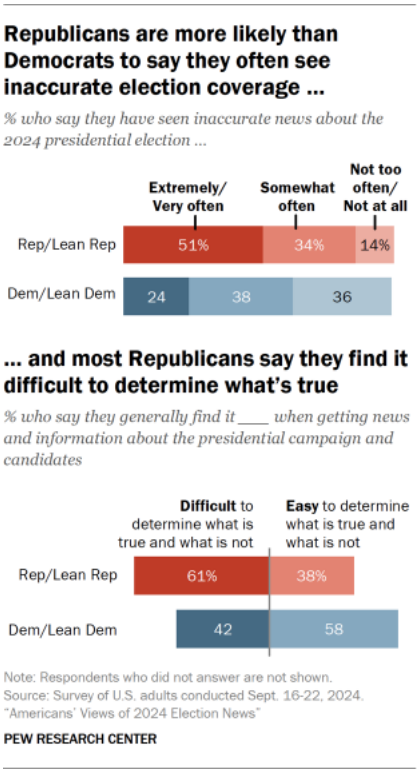

- Republicans (including independents who lean toward the GOP) are much more likely than Democrats and Democratic leaners to say they have seen inaccurate coverage and that they are having a hard time sorting out the truth.
- And Republicans are less likely than Democrats to say it is easy for them to find reliable information about the election (29% vs. 52%, respectively).

Related: Most Americans Say They Are Tuned In to News About the Trump Administration (March 2025)

Overall, Americans are much less likely to be wary of the information from their most frequent sources of election news. Much smaller shares say they at least sometimes see inaccurate information from the sources they turn to most often for news and information about the election than say the same about election news in general.

At the same time, people also say inaccurate information is coming from sources other than news outlets: 58% of Americans say they have heard people they know share information about the election that they think is inaccurate at least somewhat often. There is little difference between the parties on this question – Republicans and Democrats say they hear inaccurate information from their personal circles at roughly the same rates.

Jump to more information about Americans' views on the accuracy of election news.

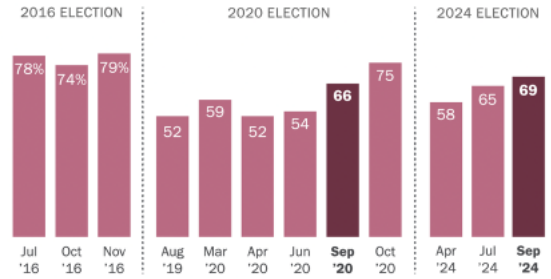

How Americans' attention toward election news has changed throughout the campaign

Overall, about seven-in-ten Americans say they are following news about the candidates for the 2024 presidential election very (28%) or fairly (40%) closely. This is up from 58% in April and 65% in July, mirroring a pattern also seen in 2020 in which attention increases closer to Election Day.

Between April and September of this year, the increase was driven particularly by Democrats, who were slightly less likely than Republicans to be following election news closely in the two earlier surveys. Now, there is no difference between the two parties in their levels of attention.

About 7 in 10 Americans are closely following news about 2024 presidential candidates

% of U.S. adults who say they have been very/fairly closely following news about candidates for the presidential election

Note: Directly comparable figures from September in election years are in bold.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.
"Americans' Views of 2024 Election News"
PEW RESEARCH CENTER

About six-in-ten Americans say they are worn out by so much coverage of the campaign, while nearly four-in-ten say they like seeing a lot of coverage. These shares are similar to those measured in April, as well as in surveys conducted in 2020 and 2016.

Jump to more about how much attention Americans are paying to election news.

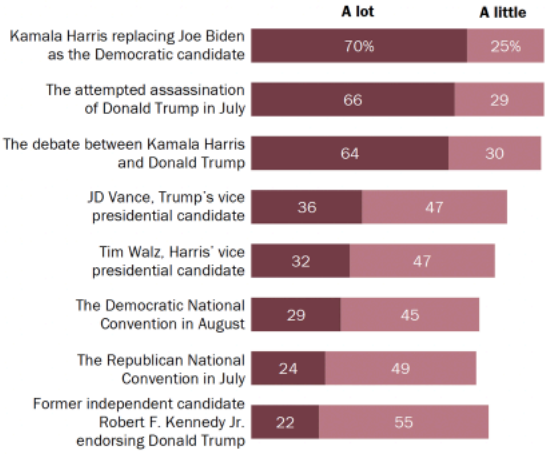

What kinds of news about the election are Americans seeing – and what do they want to see?

The survey asked Americans how much they have heard about several specific election-related topics that have been in the news in recent months.

We found that most people say they have heard or read a lot about Vice President Kamala Harris replacing President Joe Biden as the Democratic nominee (70%), the first assassination attempt on former President Donald Trump in July (66%), and the debate between Harris and Trump on Sept. 10 (64%). (The survey questions were finalized before the second assassination attempt on Trump in September.)

Majorities of Americans have heard a lot about Harris replacing Biden, Trump's July assassination attempt, and the presidential debate in September

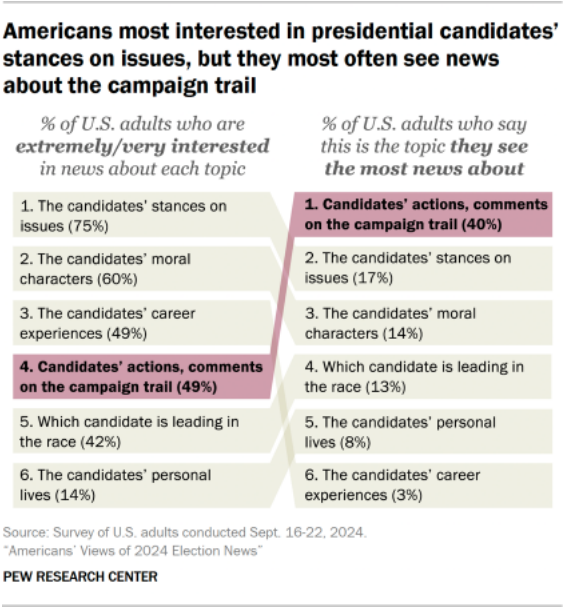

% of U.S. adults who have heard or read ___ about ...

Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.
"Americans' Views of 2024 Election News"
PEW RESEARCH CENTER

Smaller shares say they have heard a lot about the vice presidential candidates, the two parties' national conventions, and third-party candidate Robert F. Kennedy Jr. endorsing Trump when he dropped out of the race. Still, large majorities of Americans say they have heard at least a little about each of these topics.

More generally, news about the candidates' comments and actions on the campaign trail appears to be the most common type of coverage people are seeing. Four-in-ten U.S. adults say this is the type of election news they see most, outpacing information about the candidates' stances on issues (17%), their moral characters (14%) or which candidate is leading the race (13%).

This does not align with what Americans are most interested in. For example, higher shares say they are extremely or very interested in news about candidates' stances on the issues (75%) and their moral characters (60%) than say the same about candidates' comments and actions during the campaign (49%).

About half of Americans (49%) say they are extremely or very interested in the candidates' career experiences, while just 3% say this is the topic they see the most news about.

Jump to more information about what election news topics Americans are seeing.

Age differences in primary platforms used for election news

Americans get news about politics and the election in a wide variety of ways. No single platform dominates: About a third of U.S. adults (35%) say TV is their most common source of election news, while roughly one-in-five each say the same about news websites or apps (21%) and social media (20%). Smaller shares primarily use other platforms, including search engines, podcasts, radio or print publications.

Younger and older Americans are getting election news in very different ways. Nearly half of U.S. adults under 30 (46%) say that social media are their most common source of election news, while others in this age category turn to different digital sources like news websites or apps (18%), search engines (12%) or podcasts (6%). One-in-ten say TV is their most common source of election news.

But among U.S. adults ages 65 and older, a majority (63%) say TV is their top source. The same is true for 44% of those ages 50 to 64.

The survey also asked about several specific news outlets as sources of political and election news; there was little change on these questions since 2020. About two-thirds of Americans say national TV networks (ABC, CBS and NBC) are at least a minor source of political and election news for them, including three-in-ten who cite this as a major source. CNN and Fox News are each sources of election news for about half of Americans, with about two-in-ten naming each cable news network as a major source.

Smaller shares cite other outlets as major or minor sources of election news, including MSNBC, The New York Times, NPR, The Washington Post and conservative talk radio.

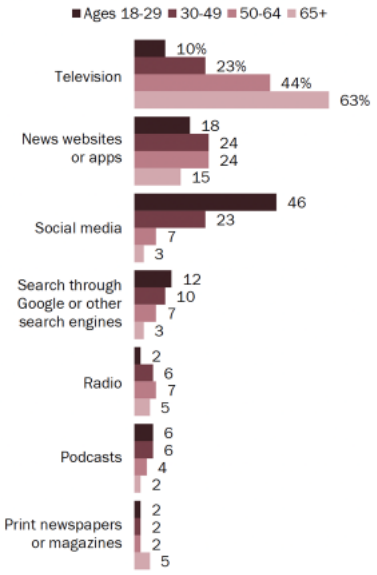

While Democrats and Republicans largely give similar answers about what platforms they use most often for election news (e.g., TV, social media, etc.), there are huge differences between the two parties on several of these specific outlets.

Republicans are much more likely than Democrats to say Fox News and talk radio are at least minor sources of election news for them. But Democrats are far more likely than Republicans to get election news from all of the other news outlets mentioned in the survey. For instance, about twice as many Democrats (72%) as Republicans (35%) say CNN is at least a minor source of political and election news for them.

Jump to more on Americans' sources of election news.

Nearly half of adults under 30 say social media are their main source of political and election news

% of U.S. adults who say ___ is the most common way they get political and election news, by age

Note: Respondents who did not give an answer or who said "Some other way" are not shown.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.
"Americans' Views of 2024 Election News"

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

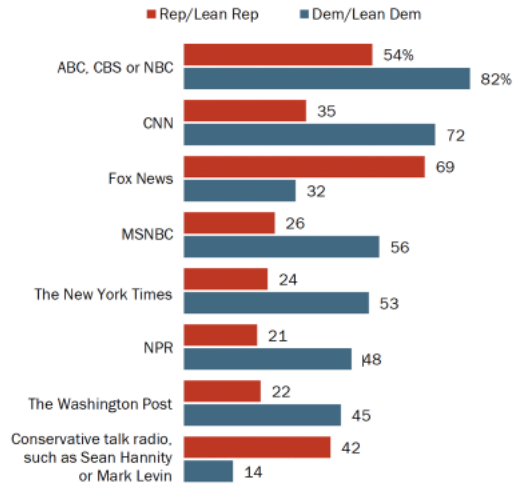

Ratings of the news media's election coverage differ by party

There also are huge partisan differences in opinions on how well the news media have done covering the 2024 presidential election.

Overall, more than half of U.S. adults say the media have done very (13%) or somewhat (45%) well covering the election, similar to the share who said the same in 2020. But Democrats are about twice as likely as Republicans to hold this opinion (77% vs. 39%).

Republicans, Democrats turn to different news outlets for election news

% who use each of the following as a major/minor source of political and election news

Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.
"Americans' Views of 2024 Election News"

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

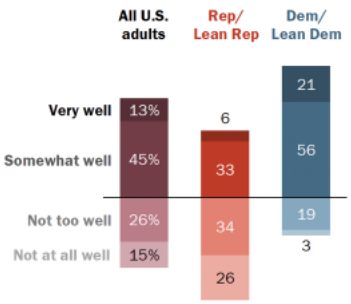

Within each party, these perceptions differ by age. While younger Democrats are less likely than older Democrats to give the media positive marks on their 2024 election coverage, the opposite is true among Republicans. Younger Republicans are somewhat more likely than their older GOP counterparts to say the media are doing at least somewhat well.

People across all political and age groups are more likely to say the news sources they turn to most often are doing well covering the election than to say the same about the news media in general.

Jump to more on how Americans feel about election news.

Over half of Republicans say the news media are doing poorly at covering the presidential election

% who say the news media have covered the presidential election ...

Note: Respondents who did not answer are not shown.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.
"Americans' Views of 2024 Election News"

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

Next: How closely are Americans following election news, and what are they seeing?

← PREV PAGE 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 NEXT PAGE →

- Report PDF
- Topline
- Questionnaire
- American Trends Panel Wave 155

Sign up for our weekly newsletter

Fresh data delivered Saturday mornings

Email Address Submit

Topics

Election 2024, Election News, Media Polarization, Misinformation, News Platforms & Sources, Politics & Media

SHARE THIS LINK: https://www.pewresearch.org/?p=188875

Related

REPORT | JUL 24, 2024

How Americans Get Local Political News

SHORT READS | MAY 28, 2024

More than half of Americans are following election news closely, and many are already worn out

SHORT READS | MAY 23, 2024

SHORT READS | OCTOBER 31, 2024

Americans' top sources of political news ahead of the 2024 election

Add Us On Google

BY CHRISTOPHER ST. AUBIN

TV network booths are set up in Chicago's United Center on Aug. 17, 2024, ahead of the Democratic National Convention. (Andrew Harnik/Getty Images)

Americans have a wide variety of news sources available to them this election season.

In September, we asked U.S. adults to name the source they turn to most often for political and election news. People mentioned hundreds of unique sources across more than 8,000 open-ended responses, demonstrating the fragmented nature of the modern news environment.

How we did this

Pew Research Center conducted this analysis to understand where Americans turn most often for their political news ahead of the 2024 presidential election. We surveyed 9,680 adults from Sept. 16 to 22, 2024.

Everyone who took part in this survey is a member of the Center's American Trends Panel (ATP), a group of people recruited through national, random sampling of residential addresses who have agreed to take surveys regularly. This kind of recruitment gives nearly all U.S. adults a chance of selection. Surveys were conducted either online or by telephone with a live interviewer. The survey is weighted to be representative of the U.S. adult population by gender, race, ethnicity, partisan affiliation, education and other factors. Read more about the ATP's methodology.

In the survey, we asked respondents in an open-ended question to volunteer their main source for political news. This allowed respondents to name any source, not limiting them to the ones we asked about in other questions. If respondents volunteered more than one source, we accepted the first one mentioned.

We grouped these open-ended responses by brand. For instance, "NY Times," "NYT" and "nytimes.com" were all counted as indicating The New York Times was the respondent's main source. Additionally, specific local television channels were grouped into the "local TV" category.

Here are the questions used for this analysis, along with responses, and its methodology.

RELATED

SHORT READS | MAY 28, 2024
More than half of Americans are following election news closely, and many are already worn out

REPORT | NOV 23, 2020
Americans Paid Close Attention as Election Returns Came In

SHORT READS | NOV 2, 2020
Two-thirds of U.S. adults say they've seen their own news sources report facts meant to favor one side

REPORT | OCT 19, 2020
Americans Plan To Follow Election Returns Closely; Biden Supporters More Confident Their News Sources Will Make Right Call

REPORT | SEP 16, 2020
Political Divides, Conspiracy Theories and Divergent News Sources Heading Into 2020 Election

TOPICS

Election News

Election News

News Coverage

News Habits & Media

Politics & Media

MOST POPULAR

1 Catholicism has lost people to religious switching in many countries, while Protestantism has gained in some

2 Teens, Social Media and Mental Health

3 Americans Have Become Less Confident in Trump's Decision-Making on Ukraine

Pew Research Center is a subsidiary of The Pew Charitable Trusts, its primary funder. This is the latest report in Pew Research Center's ongoing investigation of the state of news, information and journalism in the digital age, a research program funded by The Pew Charitable Trusts, with generous support from the John S. and James L. Knight Foundation.

The most common single outlet that Americans name as their main source for political news is Fox News (13%). Older adults are much more likely than younger adults to name Fox News: 22% of those ages 65 and older say this is their main source for this news, compared with just 5% of adults under 30.

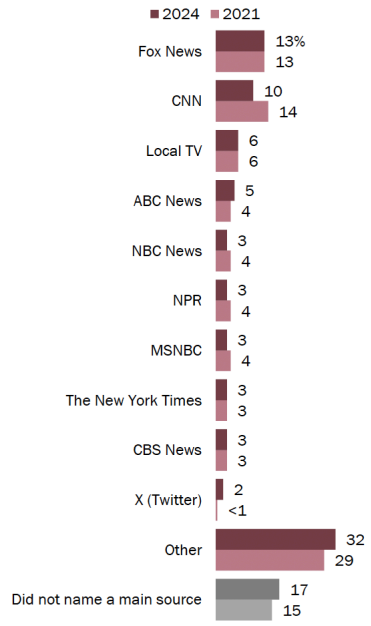

One-in-ten Americans cite CNN as their top source of political news. This represents a slight decline since the last time we asked this question in 2021, when 14% of respondents said CNN was their main political news source.

Beyond Fox News and CNN, at least 2% of Americans name eight other sources:

- A specific local TV station or local TV in general
- Other national TV news channels (ABC News, NBC News, MSNBC or CBS News)
- NPR, the only radio organization among these top sources
- The New York Times, the only traditional newspaper on the list
- X, the social media platform formerly known as Twitter. A previous Pew Research Center study found that X is more of a destination for news than other social media sites.

Americans most often say Fox News, CNN are main sources for political news

% of U.S. adults who name ___ as their main source of political news

Note: Main source of political news was asked as an open-ended question. Outlets that were mentioned by fewer than 2.0% in 2024 are not shown.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

About a third of Americans (32%) name a source other than these top 10. Another 17% say they don't have a main source of election news or decline to answer the question.

Our September survey also asked respondents what platform they most often use for election news (e.g., TV, news websites, etc.) and whether they use several specific news outlets (including many of the most common sources mentioned above) as a major or minor source of political news.

Do Americans view their main source of political news as part of the mainstream media?

The September survey also asked Americans whether they think their main source for political news is part of the "mainstream media."

Across many of the most common sources, large majorities of those who use each source say it is part of the mainstream media. For example, 84% of those who say CNN is their top source of election news say it's part of the mainstream media, compared with just 5% who say it is not.

A majority of people who list Fox News as their main source say it is part of the mainstream media (61%). But this cable news network has a larger share of users who say that it is not mainstream (28%) than other top news outlets. About one-in-five Americans who name NPR as their main source of political news (19%) also say it is not mainstream media.

4 Negative views of Israel, Netanyahu continue to rise among Americans – especially young people

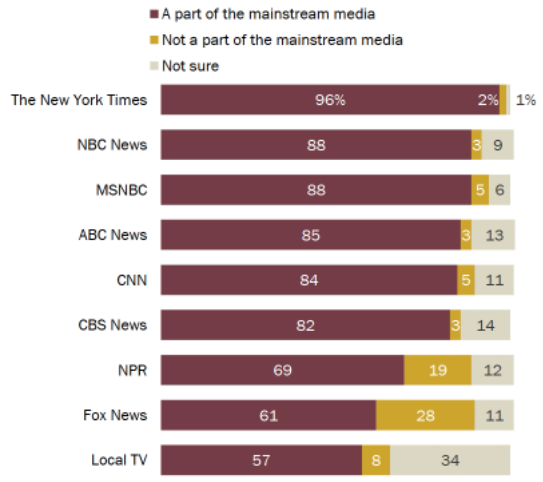

5 Americans' Social Media Use 2025

A relatively slim majority of Americans who say local TV is their main source of political news (57%) see it as mainstream media, but just 8% say this is not the case. Another 34% of these local TV news consumers say they aren't sure whether their station is part of the mainstream media.

Among adults who say Fox News is their main source of political news, 28% say it is not 'mainstream media'

Among U.S. adults who name each as their main source of political news, % who say that outlet is ...

Note: Main source of political news was asked as an open-ended question. Outlets that were mentioned by fewer than 2.0% are not shown. X (Twitter) is not included because the sample size is not large enough to analyze. Respondents who said they don't have a main source of political news, do not know their main source or refused to answer are not shown.
Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.
PEW RESEARCH CENTER

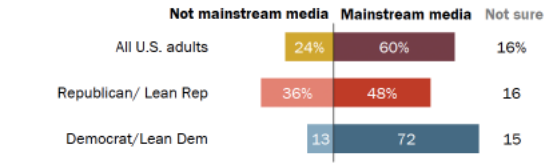

Partisanship and mainstream media

Overall, among those who listed a main source of political news, six-in-ten say that their source is part of the mainstream media. About a quarter (24%) say it is not mainstream and 16% aren't sure.

Among those who named a main source of political news, Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents are more likely than Republicans and GOP leaners to say that their main source of political news is part of the mainstream media (72% vs. 48%).

Republicans are more likely than Democrats to say their main source of political news is not mainstream

% of U.S. adults who say their main source of political news is ...

Source: Survey of U.S. adults conducted Sept. 16-22, 2024.
PEW RESEARCH CENTER

Meanwhile, Republicans are more likely than Democrats to say their main source of political news is not part of the mainstream media (36% vs. 13%).

Note: Here are the questions used for this analysis, along with responses, and its methodology.

CORRECTION (Nov. 04, 2024): A previous version of the chart "Americans most often say Fox News, CNN are main sources for political news" overstated the figure for "Other" in 2021. This change does not affect this post's analysis or overall findings.

Topics Election News, Election News, News Coverage, News Habits & Media, Politics & Media

SHARE THIS LINK: https://www.pewresearch.org/?p=191253

Christopher St. Aubin is a research analyst focusing on news and information research at Pew Research Center.

Pew Research Center

901 E St. NW, Suite 300
Washington, DC 20004
USA
(+1) 202-419-4300 | Main
(+1) 202-857-8562 | Fax
(+1) 202-419-4372 | Media Inquiries

RESEARCH TOPICS

Politics & Policy
International Affairs
Immigration & Migration
Race & Ethnicity
Religion
Age & Generations
Gender & LGBTQ
Family & Relationships
Economy & Work
Science
Internet & Technology
News Habits & Media
Methodological Research

FOLLOW US

Email Newsletters
YouTube
Instagram
Facebook
LinkedIn
X
Bluesky
Threads
RSS Feed

ABOUT PEW RESEARCH CENTER Pew Research Center is a nonpartisan, nonadvocacy fact tank that informs the public about the issues, attitudes and trends shaping the world. It does not take policy positions. The Center conducts public opinion polling, demographic research, computational social science research and other data-driven research. Pew Research Center is a subsidiary of The Pew Charitable Trusts, its primary funder.

© 2026 Pew Research Center